Suppression of the high frequency power of the optic nerve head surface with an argon laser. Previous studies have suggested that a transient decrease in intraocular pressure may stimulate the optic nerve and result in significant short-term effects on optic nerve morphology. This study was undertaken to determine if the effects of intraocular pressure reduction might be due to vascular change. A pilot study showed that a continuous beam of argon laser light reduced intraocular pressure by more than 50% in rabbits. In this study, 20 rabbits received argon laser treatment, and seven untreated rabbits were observed as controls. Routine histological studies on eyes were performed. Histological studies revealed a greater number of capillaries in the ciliary processes of rabbits in the treatment group. The findings suggest that the nerve fiber layer blood supply may be stimulated by increased intraocular pressure and that a reduction of intraocular pressure may enhance the number of capillaries found in the ciliary processes of rabbits.

Complete ventriculomegaly in a young adult. Primary hydrocephalus can occur in childhood, but is most often secondary to other causes in adults. Complete ventriculomegaly (CV) is exceedingly rare, but this entity may present in an adult. This report describes an adult case of CV caused by a solitary metastatic hepatic cell carcinoma. The literature on this condition is reviewed and clinical and pathological findings are presented. CV can be diagnosed in the absence of hydrocephalus and should be considered as a rare cause of ventriculomegaly./* * Copyright (c)
