What's new:

and Nuclear Civilization [edit] This chapter draws on the research of James C. Hagerty in which he argued for the centrality of nuclear war during the Cold War era. The book contributed more to the field of international relations than previous books about the Cold War.[29] Japan Japan was developed comparatively late in modern history, and for many years country was held back by ancient philosophies and a lack of innovation[30] and was unable to challenge American hegemony.[31] It joined the United Nations[32] in 1956, becoming one of the charter members.[33] In 1957, with the strength of the newly developed Strategic Air Command and a continuous flow of funding from the United States and the United Kingdom, Japan began to develop and deploy nuclear weapons. This contributed to the suspicion about Japan's intentions among America and the UK.[34] By the end of the war, there were sixteen nuclear weapons in Japan, and ten were installed on Okinawa and eight on the northern island of Hokkaido. In contrast, Britain and the United States possessed 833 and 1,138 weapons respectively during the same period, and were stockpiling many thousands more. Britain's and America's nuclear forces were deployed on their respective bases in England and the United States, but as late as 1970, Japan still had no base of their own.[35][36][37] Japan also had a large military budget and was considered as having a formidable military capacity against any potential attack by the Soviet Union.[38][39] The Soviets believed Japan would attack if provoked, due to U.S. occupation of their sphere of influence in Southeast Asia and the perceived large presence of U.S. forces on Okinawa.[40][41] In 1971, 2.5 million Japanese attended an anti-war rally and signed the 'Chuiki' petition to voluntarily close down the nuclear weapons.[42] However, the 1973 election victory of the pro-American Liberal Democratic Party encouraged the continuation of weapons research and development. The defence budget increased from £6,563 million in 1972 to £9,137 million in 1977.[43] In 1967, it was reported that there were 70 places on the island where the Americans, British and Canadians would happily settle down for occupation, and that one of these places, for example, being "Birdcage Bay, near the town of Yuya on Okinawa's south-west tip", could be the location of the nuclear bases which would force the Japanese to accept the United
