Editor's note: This story contains strong language, including names of victims. Every time we take the bus, we face a risk. A risk that is inherent to public transit and part of any transit rider's daily life. As a transit advocate, I've always been keenly aware of that risk, and I've made it a point to minimize it whenever I can. I do my homework. My first bus ride in San Diego on a number-bearing bus is usually a highlight of the day, by my calculation. I've noticed a trend, however: In recent years, more and more people are riding the bus without proper ID and/or credit cards. My first reaction was to wonder what kinds of horrible things could happen to someone who doesn't have a car and doesn't have a credit card and no ID. Then it dawned on me: In the face of a terrible shooting, it seems as though some people think something like that will happen to them while riding the bus. And that's OK. It's less OK if they continue to ride the bus. Several people I know have experienced such incidents. Others have been victims of robberies on buses and, more rarely, on public transit, as I have. (One of the most common stories we hear is that a person was so engrossed in reading a book on the bus, they were oblivious to people who were stealing from them.) San Diego has had a big problem with crime in the last several years. Transit has been a frequent target. In fact, San Diego transit in particular has seen more problems than in other cities. So why should crime and security measures on buses matter to someone who is riding a bus every day of the week?
